Our world has a lot of different countries. They all have distinct cultures, history, etc. So, what do different countries give to the world?

We can begin answering that question by taking a look at food that is eaten in countries. For example, Japanese food has sushi, Russian food features borsch, Mexican cuisine has tacos and France is famous for its^① baguettes. Every country enjoys its^① own food, which brings a lot of diversity to our world.

However, countries don't only share their cuisines with the world. They also contribute to scientific advancements and have different natural resources within their borders. For example, Saudi Arabia, Venezuela, and Russia^② have a lot of oil, Australia sells lots of coal and there are lots of other resources that are exported by countries in our world, such as copper, iron, natural gas and others.

Finally, there are lots of cultural traditions and activities all around the world. There are even some that are celebrated internationally, such as Halloween, New Year, Christmas and so on. There are lots of local traditions and festivals that exist in our world too.

In conclusion, different countries give our world a lot of diversity, scientific contributions and natural resources, among other things. It's very important that we recognize their part
